Oral analgesia in the management of burns. Pain control is one of the key priorities in the management of burns. However, the increased sensitivity of individuals to opioids can result in undesirable side effects or even respiratory depression. Nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs offer alternatives, but generally are less effective in treating burn-related pain. Opioids are highly effective and are effective in treating all types of burn pain. Physicians are reluctant to prescribe opioids to patients with burn injuries because the opioids must be tapered gradually over a number of months before discontinuation. The paper outlines some of the challenges in opioid prescribing, as well as some alternative pain control modalities for patients suffering from burns. Opioids are first-line treatment for burns; alternative analgesics may be used as adjuncts to provide pain control. Opioids are an excellent option for treating burns, but need to be prescribed carefully because of serious side effects and even deaths. Non-opioid analgesics are a good option for treating burns, but their effectiveness is less than for opioids.Story highlights Lisa A. Monsour: Sex has been framed as a "dangerous" activity People who advocate for safe sex can do it without sexualization, she says Megan Sullenger died of an AIDS-related illness at age 23: founder of the Love Without Limits Monsour: Love should not be predicated on the performance of any behavior, especially sex Anyone who has devoted time to anything other than sex might be moved to tears at the sight of Andrea Lee and her 13-year-old son, Gabriel. Gabriel suffered a brain injury from a fall at age 3, a concussion, and a broken femur, causing him to lose his right leg. Andrea's main concern: Would Gabriel have difficulty becoming a father? Would he be able to understand the process of a pregnancy? She discovered he was HIV positive, she shares. The same day Gabriel was diagnosed, his father died. After Andrea learned she was HIV positive, her life changed. She and Gabriel decided to dedicate themselves to advocating for safer sex: to educating people about safer sex; and to becoming advocates for the broader issues of sex education, education in sexual health, and treating HIV/AIDS as a disease, not as a moral issue. Andrea's commitment to those issues has now cost her her life. On July 1, she died at age 31 from complications of heart disease and AIDS. Gabriel, who lost his
